Microsoft, marketing & communication, some experience, developer Belgium share on
Isn't it poignant how a substantial amount of money is spent on marketing material, only for it never to be used again? Don't you think there must be a better way for companies to manage product information and digital assets?

At delaware, we provide our customers with a so-called Single Source of Truth (SSoT) solution; a centralized, easily accessible platform that houses all of the client's data. Because that's the tricky thing with data - it's usually stored in silos. With our help in managing the full life cycle of digital assets and product information, our customers can efficiently offer accurate information through each and every channel. Have a look at the Niko website to see what we mean. Not too bad, right?

We don't mean to toot our own horn, but we do think that delaware offers the perfect environment for a solution architect to grow. Here, you'll be surrounded by experts who specialize in both building and integrating custom software solutions. You see, we don't believe in a one-size-fits-all approach, for either the solutions we build or our developers' careers. Are you a developer at heart and hungry for more? Then keep reading!

What will you be doing as a solution architect?

“Solution architect” is quite the title. Here’s what you’ll be responsible for:

Let’s be clear: Customers rarely come to us saying ‘I need you to build me an SSoT solution’.

Based on the issue they describe, you’ll come to grips with their businessreality and design a solution that perfectly fits their needs.

While the development portion is the project’s biggest chunk, as a solution architect you’ll focus more on the follow-up meaning you keep a close eye on your team of expert developers.

Keeping into account the specific client context and the standard functionalities of the solution, you’ll configure the system.

You’ll often meet with the customer and organize workshops to explain the project’s workflow. Since you’ve established solid working relationships, the client will count on you to translate complex technical lingo to understandable business terms .

You’ll play a friendly game of idea ping-pong with stakeholders all over the company, streamlining back-and-forth meetings between the client’s development team and delaware’s.

As a solution architect, you’ll be in the lead of projects, getting the absolute best out of your team, every step along the way. In the end, solutions are built together!

We have offices in Gent, Antwerpen, Wavre, Kortrijk and Lummen, but you will also regularly visit our clients on-site , to discuss requirements and train key users. Many of our clients are international players, which means your work as a solution architect might take you abroad as well. Don’t let that put you off, though: These trips usually take 2 to 3 days and we’ll always strive to minimize the impact on your work-life balance.
